Cell structure and function is determined by genetics, chemical signals, and physical factors.
How does a cell sense stiffness?

Multiple molecular springs in series create the possibility of variable signals depending on which spring is the weakest (most deformed).

Understanding mechanosensing requires defining the identity and mechanical properties of the molecules that constitute these springs.
Lots of complexity at the junctions: many springs